The First Americans is Based on the Discovery of Some of the Earliest Physical Evidence for America's First Residents Friday, October 18, 2007 Mercer County (Pa.) Reporter: "The First Americans: The Art, the Science, the Search for the Ancestors of North America's First Peoples" by Dorothy Morrison at the Discovery Center in Doylestown, PA, this weekend, and at the Penn Museum in Philadelphia from Oct. 25-28. Julian Guthrie, a South African geologist, discovered the first "fossil" native to North America of a human being more than two and a half million years ago. Guthrie's discovery, on the dry, rocky steppes of South Africa, was in a fossilized skull that clearly showed the Asian ancestry of the first Americans. It was in 1908, and Guthrie came to the country with his son, Richard. The car they drove had a bird on the hood, and when they arrived at the site, the bird started walking down the road. The father and son drove farther down the road, where they turned the car around and returned to fetch the bird. This was the first discovery of the earliest human remains from the Americas, and since that time, the remains of hundreds of individuals have been found in North and South America. In the United States, they have been found in caves in New Mexico and Texas, on the banks of rivers in Tennessee and Georgia, and in caves in
